

Code decision: there is not a pagename system that accommodates the old style code and desired new style. Code either needs to be re-written first, or SHC will need to work with contractor who is familiar with wiki and can assist in archiving / reorganization as data is ported over to new style.

In general, ensuring that the creation / revision of pages is legible requires close attention. There are many decision points: (when do you make a new page vs revise an old one? how do you look at all versions of the 'pet policy' over time? do you link to old pages in new pages? will page indexing need to change as a result of new organization of Code? how will this be archived?)

Titles & their namespaces create further difficulties. More difficult to archive namespaces and included pages, creates potentially illegible "filesystem" of pages/folders in wiki. Title pages should likely only have numerical assignments in pageid, since they will never house data that needs to be archived in revision history, only different sets of tags/pages to be imported and shown. Not an issue if Code is archived in its entirety with every change.

Best way to archive ALL OF CODE is to print the page that includes all policies as a PDF whenever it is changed.
